CAREFUL SCRUTINY OF STRANGERS

Zip! Zip! Zip! Zip! like the flight of a startled duck across the gleaming face of the river sped a rifle ball and buried itself in the shalv bank.

"Ah, sir," said a woman who stood with her arms rolled up in her apron, "twere better they did all go into the bank like that one than into the bodies of the poor men over there."

The whistle of a train at Swissvale station sounded shrilly. Below shone the Monongahela and over yonder directly in front frowned the blackened, silent chimnevs and stacks of the Homestead works.

There to the right lay the town of Homestead stretching back from the smoking chimneys of the glass works to the hills. The town that "Carboline" Kennedy saw in his mind years ago lay there brave in new brick homes and yellow, freshly cut streets. Then came the rambling buildings and the green spots of Chief Elliot's farm. Here began the line of white new fence which skirts the river bank and can be seen along the railroad track between the buildings of the mill plant.

The Mills and the Borges.

Then came the long lines of idle workshops, the great piles of metal in ingots, ore and merchantable forms, ranged one against the other for half a mile along the erescent of the river bend. Cutting the glistening line of the water, just above us to the left, were the weblike lines of the railroad bridge, and there, on the northern shore, were the tall stacks of the Carrie

Lying close under the sheer, tall bank, just above the bridge, were the causus belli, the two barges loaded with Pinkerton men. That is hardly exact—they were loaded with such freight a few moments ago, but now they have a mixed and motley crowd on them, for the surrender has taken place and victors and vanquished are together at closer quarters than they have been since the early morning.

Along the bare knobs on the high northern side of the river, hundreds of people armed with opera glasses, telescopes and field glasses have been standing for hours. Up at the Carrie Furnaces there are five or six hundred men in a group. Here and there on the hillside and group. Here and there on the hillside and down along the bank, near the roadway of the Baltimore and Ohio, were snap-shot artists taking what they could get—just as the people across the stream were doing with the furnishment of the boats they had ptured, only they had no cameras.

The Shout of Victory. A great shout comes across the water, and, een through powerful field glasses, a stream of men, women and children climbs up the ank from the boats and is soon lost sight of behind the mill buildings. In the center of this stream are men carrying bags and condites, men who are evidently under ruard. They are the prisoners, going the know not where in the wilderness of work-shops. Derisive cheers and cries come clearly up from the valley and now and then there is the crack of a revolver or the louder boom of a gun.

Those who went first, those who formed the main body of the captured, were hustled and jostled as they walked slowly through the crowd, and sticks and stones were be-stowed upon them from the outer edges of the throng with cheerful liberality. Those who tailed the procession, the men who struggled along singly or in pairs, were the ones who suffered most. They were beaten with clubs or struck with chunks that lay handy, and which were hurled in right go earnest. Occasionally one of the men would be thrown down, and then some stalwart, coatless figure would do a skirt dance on the stomach of the common foe. It was too far away to catch the expression on faces, but there was a limpness and a staggering and a dragging of arms and legs after these little scenes that was as pathetic and spoke as loudly of pain and suffering as words or

Hurrying the Men Ashore

For half an hour this went on. Now and then some man would be rushed up the bank and out into the mill yard. These laggards paid well for their taridness, whatever its cause was, for they ran the guantlet of the angry crowd like in the days when the squaws wielded rods and tomahawks and white men ran between the more cheering, and then it seemed as though anjant hill had been opened and its in-habitants were fleeing in every direction. These human ants bore burdens. Some had glistening burdens, some bore loads of a brilliant red and others white or brown. These on inspection became coffee pots, tin pans, bedding, mattresses, packages of provisions or clothing—the plunder of the barges. For another half hour these busy ones carried off their findings through the yards, up the tracks, along the river outside the fence, or loaded them in skiffs and carried them across the river. Then came a cloud of boys, little girls and women, who seemed to ransack the barges of smaller articles, and then as if disgusted or satiated they began throwing hings into the river. Wash tubs, pots and right tinware floated slowly down the uggish stream and bobbed up and down ove where the bodies of some of the addenly there was a quick movement on barges. Children were off first and then and women followed them. They hur-i off a hundred yards, half above and if below the barges, and stood looking at em as if something was to happen. Some-ing did happen very shortly. From a orner of the barge furthest out from the pank came a puff of smoke, then a lame shot up into the air and by the time one could count 100, both of the barges were brilliantly ablaze. There was oil and tar in plenty on the barges if one could judge from the smoke, for in a great, deuse column it rose straight in the air until it seemed to join the rose tinted mackerel clouds. Blacker and blacker, bigger and bigger grew the smoke cloud, and wild were the cheers from both groups of strikers.

They waved caps and hats, guns and clubs. Just then a locomotive, black with men, run seross the bridge, and when it was midway over the water a tall man stood up on the tender, waved a white rag and danced a jig. Soon the smoke decreased as the fire lessened, and the hulks with their cargo of glowing embers or burning timbers came clearly into sight, while the steamboat land-Women and Children as Sp All this time the crowds on the hills in-

The twilight came, lights began to twinkle in the homes on the hills and in the valley. The light of the embers gleamed across the river mingling with the stray sun rays. Night was coming. It was said that bullets broke some glasses in the houses near by, and one woman showed a bullet which had buried itself in the door of her kitchen.

A Walk From Brown's Station to Braddock That Was Full of Incident-Strangers Regarded With Considerable Caution Men Who Had Opinions.

When a reporter for THE DISPATCH made a trip along the north side of the Monongahela river yesterday afternoon there were some queer things developed.
The reporter started from Brown's station, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, with the purpose in view of finding out just exactly where the cannon was located which had caused such deadly effect. The cannon could not be found on the north side of the river. The fact is it had ceased its boom-

Discussed From the Standpoints of Both Capital and Labor.

THE CALL FOR A CITIZEN'S MEETING

All conversation in Pittsburg streets yesterday was on the one all-absorbing topic of the terrible troubles at Homestead. And to all practical purposes public opinion was united in condemning the manufacturers to a greater or less degree. Plenty of deep egrets were uttered that the strikers should have been ill-advised enough to disregard the orders of their leaders and resort to violence: but even the most conservative among the talkers laid the blame at the manufacturers' door for provoking the anger

"That's what it was provoked for."
"What a name Pittsburg will get."
"It's got it already."
"If the manufacturers simply wanted to protect their property there should have been no sneaking in about it. If their property was in danger they should have brought a strong force in by daylight, as they had a right to do, and not tried to smuggle in a few men at the mercy of the strikers by night," said an iron manufacturer.

Raffasal to Accept Union Deputies.

Refusal to Accept Union Deputies. Refusal to Accept Union Deputies.

The general opinion seemed to be that so long as the offer of the Association men to be sworn in as deputies was refused, the Sheriff was powerless to get together any considerable force of local volunteers. As to the militia, attention was called to the fact that many militiamen, even from a distance, are mill workers, and that even those who are not would be likely to let their sympathy with labor rather than their military sense of duty control their their military sense of duty control their

Pittsburg was well posted as to the fight and not a few went back of that to discuss the differences in the scale. Most of the debaters, however, expressed an opinion that the rioting and the strike were due to no petty differences as to rate of pay, but that it was a fight deliberately entered into by the manufacturers to free themselves from the power of expanied labor. There from the power of organized labor. There were plenty of sarcastic allusions to free

MEETING OF THE CABINET HELD

(SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO THE DISPATCH.) HARRISBURG, July 6 .- When Governor Pattison retired at a late hour last night he closed his eyes with the consciousness that the Homestead labor troubles would be peacefully settled, but he had scarcely entered the Executive Chamber this morning before he received the startling news of an outbreak that had already resulted in the death of several persons. This information was supplemented a short time afterward by intelligence announcing the death of ten

The Governor was shocked at the serious turn of affairs and anxiously awaited official information concerning the fight. About 10:45 a dispatch was received at the Executive Department from Sheriff Mc-Cleary, stating that the civil authorities were utterly unable to cope with the striking workmen, 5,000 of whom were on the ground. He spoke of his deputies having een driven away by the strikers and briefly referred to shots that had been exchanged and to the fact that several men had been killed. Prompt measures were suggested to prevent further bloodshed and to avert great destruction of property. The Governor and the Sheriff.

The Governor was evidently not satisfied with the message, as it did not show what efforts the Sheriff had made to secure a reasonably large force of deputies to preserve the peace. A reply was promptly wired that the "local authorities must exhaust every means at their command," after he had eliminated from the dispatch as originally framed a statement that there would be no military interference until it had been demonstrated that the civil power was inadequate to the preservation of peace. The Governor during the early afternoon received a large number of dispatches of a private nature from residents of Pittsburg and vicinity making suggestions as to the policy he should pursue with relation to the violent disturbance. Some of the writers urged him to have the troops ordered out promptly in the interest of peace, one of them expressing the fear that if such action were not taken the riots of 1877 would be more than paralleled. Any Quantity of Advice. Most of these dispatches were from personal friends of the Governor. Other friends counseled him against too much haste in shoving the military to the front, as this mode of meeting the difficulty might be attended with more serious consequences than an attempted suppression of the outbreak by the civil authorities. Several persons, who kept the Governor posted as to the progress of the fight, insisted that the Sheriff had not exhausted his means to restore peace, and that, in view of that fact, military interposition was not justifiable. One of them strongly intimated that the active presence of Pinkerton detectives had precipitated the conflict, which was not started until these obnoxious people made their appearance on the scene. Owing to the divergent views as represented in the various telegrams and the unsatisfactory character of the Sheriff's appeal for help, the Governor was unable to make up his mind as to the best policy he should pursue. Action of the Executive. In order to reach an early conclusion he addressed a dispatch to Sheriff McCleary asking him how many deputies he had sworn in and what measures he had taken to enforce order and protect property. Over two hours elapsed before he received a reply, which stated that 12 deputies selected by the Sheriff had been driven away by the strikers and closing with the statement that the civil authorities were powerless to meet the situation, that an armed and disciplined force was needed to prevent further loss of life, and that immediate action was demanded from the Executive.

The Governor read the reply with evident displeasure and promptly dictated the fol-

Your telegram indicates that you have not made any attempt to execute the law to enforce order, and I must insist on your call-ing upon the citizens for an adequate number of deputies.

During the morning and afternoon the Governor had several conferences with Sec retary Harrity and Attorney General Hensel relative to the situation at Homestead. Adjutant General Greenland, who had been n Philadelphia, reached Harrisburg this afternoon, and just before Sheriff McCleary's telegram, which elicited the sharp answer from the Governor, was received, the Chief Executive and his Adjutant General had a consultation as to the advisability of dispatching a portion of the National Guard to the scene of the labor troubles. A Meeting of the Cabinet, At a late hour there was a full meeting of the Cabinet on the same subject. The Gov-ernor is thoroughly convinced that the military should not be called out to suppress secured that the civil power is inadequate to the emergency. As an illustration of the virtue and force of the exercise of the civil power he refers to the settlement of the strike at the Pennsylvania Steel Company's works, two miles east of this city, nearly a year ago. The Dauphin county Sheriff and his deputies then had no difficulty in preserving the peace, although nearly 4,000 men were on a strike. Pattison received a dispatch from Pitta-burg to-night from one of the Governor's staff as follows: "Pinkerton men have surrendered and strikers have allowed them to land. They are now on their way to this city. Everything is quiet now and no trouble is apprehended to-night. Your last telegram to the Sheriff has induced him to issue a proclamation calling upon citizens to meet at 9 A. M. to-morrow, prepared to go to Homestead and restore order. Your course meets general approval." Governor Pattison said to-night that he had at no time to-day intended to call out the troops his information not justifying such action. Soldiers are not policemen, he said, to be sent for to quell any disturb-ance, however small. He was satisfied that if a resort had been had to military interference that the settlement of the troubles at Homestead would have been deferred nuch longer than under existing circum-

The Governor took occasion to deny emphatically the truth of the dispatch from Atlantic City printed in a number of papers stating that he intended to visit Pittsburg in response to an alleged petition asking him to go there. He had no knowledge of such a petition and also denied having sent several dispatches to Attorney General Hensel relative to the Homestead situation. Everything in the telegram he declared to be a misstatement, as beknew nothing then of any serious trouble at Homestead. The Governor said the idea of Sheriff McCleary having performed his duty in pressing into service ten deputies to suppress the out-break was absurd.

ONE OF THE KILLED BURIED.

An Artery in Joseph Lupa's Log Was Ser ered by a Builet, and He Died.

Yesterday afternoon a pine coffin stained red, a figure in blue overalls, a black driver and a gray horse, rattled down Stevenson street, and all that was mortal of Joseph Lupa, a striking workman of the Homestead Steel Company, was hauled over the uneven streets of Pittsburg to his home in St. Mary's cemetery.

Joseph Lupa and a lellow workman were wounded early yesterday morning, when the Pinkertons attacked the guard at the works. Both were shot below the joint of the knee, but the bullet that struck Lupa had been billeted and cut one of the main attacks of the leg. His sees were honeless had been billeted and cut one of the main arteries of the leg. His case was hopeless when he arrived at the hospital, but it was thought his robust strength would pull him through. The examination made by the surgeons shortly after his entrance into the hospital decided his fate.

His body was turned over to the Coroner at sunsec last evening.

There were three men follow-ing him, but about every hundred yards he was stopped by gentlemen who insisted upon knowing his business. agreed after a few persuasive words, that he be allowed to follow the roadway leading With a heart full of greatfulness he started up the road with an idea in his nod-dle that all dangers had been overcome. "What are you going to do here?" was a query that stopped the reporter suddenly within five minutes after he had parted from his supposed friends. The reply was

Along up the river similar delegations were met. It was question and answer until the Pemicky bridge was reached. At this point a man fired a shot and it knocked the reporter out.

The reporter thought this a salute, but the whiz of a bullet made him stop and think. He did not have to think long be-fore out of the bushes above the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad tracks came a great, big, brawny fellow, who also wanted to know what the intruder wanted. The answer settled everything. But shots were being fired in the air and they were for fun. The fun, however, was far reached. posite Homestead it was kept up until the poor fellows on the barges had put out the white flag of surrender. When this was done the many boats struck for the shore, and wo-men were the gayest of the gay in them. When it was learned that the men on the barges had surrendered one of the most indescribable scenes occurred. The boats which scribable scenes occurred. The boats which had been lying upon the opposite side of the river practically dropped their rough crews and their places were taken by women. Along the road clear down to Braddock were men who were dressed in evidently their best suit of clothes. They were all either bound for Homestead or therefrom. They were all telling the story of their experiences either among the of their experiences either among the fighters or among those who showed their sympathy with them. To say that they were enthusiastic would but put it mildly. There was not a man among them who had not an opinion to express and a strong one of the crowds by importing men for whom there is so deep a hate as is universally felt for the employes of Pinkerton.

As the bulletins appeared one after anrent of events at the scene of action, but it mismanagement which had fired the passions of the workmen.

"Surely the tro fixed before it came to this pass," said one peaceable looking, well clad man. "Of course it could," replied another whose whole bearing breathed of labor, "but the managers of the works didn't want to settle it; what they wanted was to incite the men to riots and they did it too."

"But," said the first speaker, "what object could they have in so doing? A Laborers' View of the Action And the man of labor replied: "Can't you see that they want to be independent of union labor once and for all? If that's not what they want, I'd like to know why they refused to accept the services of members of the Alamagated Association as deputy sheriffs with bonds filed as a guarantee that they would properly discharge their duties. If they didn't want to make trouble, why did they choose men who are the hated of the labor world to be the de-fenders of their property, and if they must have Pinkerton men why didn't they take 'em right into the yard by the railway?" And this is only a sample of many similar sayings. Another opinion of the tactics of the Carnegie people was that they should either have imported no men at all or have made such a show of strength as would have been irresistible. Many were the reminis-cences of 1877 recalled and chatted over during the day, and many were the com-parisons drawn between then and now. There was a strong inclination to doubt the news sent from the front, made such a show of strength as would have and as item after item was confirmed and the absence of exaggeration was definitely ascertained the bulletin readers were convinced and saddened the more by their convictions. Yet there was no sug-gestion of a panic, and, with characteristic American nonchalance, laughter was in-dulged in whenever a spark of humor lit up the situation, and there was a general feel-ing that "it'll all come out right in the At The Dispatch Bulletin Board, Talks in front of THE DISPATCH window were passed from mouth to mouth, and the second received a comment from the third and so on. All sorts and conditions of men made remarks en passant.

"This is terrible," said one. "It hurts both sides," remarked another. "I'd give anything," said a quiet looking tradesman, "if the men hadn't fired the first shot."

"Well, now its started, I hope they'll give them Pinkertons such a lesson as'll keep 'em out of this State for the future," went on a man who looked like a clerk of some on a man who looked like a clerk of some on a man who looked like a derk of some kind. Then a lawyerly looking individual added: "They may be able to run the country round Chicago or Cleveland with Pinkertons, but when they come into Pennsylvania the sooner they find out their mistake the better it'll be for their health." "Homebetter it it be for their health." "Home-stead ain't going to run Pittsburg," said a dapper, dignified little man. "Homestead doesn't want to," replied a brawny specimen of athletic humanity, "it wants to manage its own affairs, and wants outsiders to leave it alone, as it leaves them."

it alone, as it leaves them."

When the bulletin announced that the Pinkerton ammunition was giving out, a bystander whose outward appearance was more that of a man of lashion than of a man of muscle, chuckled as he remarked to his companion, "It isn't our ammunition," and his neighbor replied: "You bet it isn't; we're going to drive those Pinkertons to the bottom of the river or off the lace of the earth."

Difference in Theory and Practice.

Temperate talk was by no means common. A remark that the workers had no right to use force to prevent others from accepting the terms they had refused brought out a man who looked as if he had weathered many strikes, who said in a sardonic tone of voice: "That's all right in theory, friend, but in practice it is found rather hard to deal with capitalists without

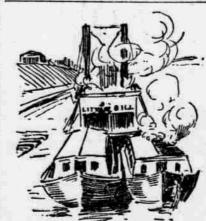

But in general the opinions were that the strikers had injured them-selves by the use of arms and force, and that the real blame for the matter lay with those who had placed temptation in their way. There was a talk of monopolies and monopolists in the air and the tendency of manufacturers to combine with or absorb one another, and several speaders instanced the Homestead works as rapidly approach-

As the evening wore on spectators of the violence appeared and were rapidly sur-rounded by knots of excited auditors. But even the harrowing description given by the eye witnesses of the dastardly treat-ment given to the Pinkerton men after their surrender failed for the most part to draw forth any condemnation of the strikers or sympathy for the abused prisoners. It appeared on all sides that the odium in which
